The Starting Point. The Starting Point.

It has been stated above that the original starting point of cetarrh was immediately back of the soft palate at the junction of the back bortion of the nose and upper part of the throat. All experienced nose and throat specialists know this to be a fact, and there is a with logical reason for this. The two miscus surfaces at the bond lie in close contact with each other, and thus collect and countse the secretions dropping from the upper and back part of the head until they dry up into little nodules and putrify, causing a foul ofor and considerable irritation of the servounding microsinembrane. Patients verify this by constantly hawking and gauging to disorder these secretions. From this point the catarrhal instantly hawking and gagging to dislocke these secretions. From this point the catarchal inflammation a so often extends downwards to the respiratory tract, invading the larges, windpipe, bronchial tubes and the lungs, causing on its any according to the parts affected, largestis, with hourseness and partial or complete loss of voice, bronchins or chronic cough, asthma, consumption, etc. Other Symptoms.
